He was appointed as director of this scheme in 1832 and the area covered in this volume was the first to be completed. He was largely responsible for the creation of the Geological Museum and all of his works remain fundamental to the history of geology.

An important collection, despite the caveats of Scott, originally assembled by Thomas Brand and Thomas Hollis and inherited by Disney's father, for whom the Hyde, built by Sir William Chambers, was specifically designed with the antiquities in mind. Disney, who was influenced by Flaxman and James Christie, amongst others, augmented the collection, though not perhaps with the greatest discernment, particularly in regard to the marbles and including items from Pompeii. These now form a key part of the holdings of the Fitzwilliam Museum, though some parts were dispersed at auction in the 1880s. Disney is also remembered for founding the chair of archaeology at Cambridge.

Ref. William Pickering and his Successors 132.

The section on the Cecils of Burghley from Drummond's book. From the fragmented pagination of the complete work, and the fact that only a very small number of copies were printed, it seems probably that individual sections were struck off for private circulation for the families concerned.

'Whittingham meanwhile had acquired some celebrity as a printer of coats-of-arms, this speciality coming about, no doubt, through his work on the various "Peerages", and on Drummond's "Noble Families", a privately printed book of which only four copies were made.' Warren, The Charles Whittinghams Printers, pp.148-49.

'..one of the earliest and best of books with coloured aquatints...Malton as a typographical draughtsman had few equals, and the plates..have a distinction of their own in addition to their value as an architectural record' - Hardie.

Abbey, Scenery, 536.

Milford, owned by Sir William Hamilton, had been developing as a port since the Milford Haven Harbour Act of 1790 under the direction of Hamilton's nephew Charles Greville. A shipyard was leased to the navy in 1796 and after Nelson's visit in 1802 the Navy Board began to extend the dockyard buildings. However it was unable to buy the shipyard outright as the Grevilles priced themselves out of the market and the development moved to Pembroke Dock in 1812-14.

This book seems to have been produced, by the unknown author using the nom-de-plume 'Pembrocensis', with a view to describing and promoting Milford's aspirations as a port but virtually all of the plans fell by the wayside for a variety of reasons and large-scale docks would not be constructed until the 1870s.

Together 7 sheets, first title with each map 19 x 27 ins and in original outline colour, the reduction $26\frac{1}{2} \times 22\frac{1}{4}$ ins., very good. £1,500.00

Apparently the second issue of the 6-sheet survey which first appeared in October 1791. A finer, clearer, more detailed map than Taylor's first large-scale Hampshire map of 1759 showing minor as well as major roads, towns, villages, forests, parks, castles, country houses etc.

A superbly extra-illustrated set of Milner's fine history, 'commonly regarded as one of the best town histories' (Gross).

Northwick, 'one of the hallowed names among English collectors', was obliged to acquire Thirlestane, later owned by another omnivorous collector in Sir Thomas Phillipps, as Northwick Park was unable to house his huge collection of pictures and antiquities, despite the addition of a purpose-built gallery.

One of the most infamous incursions of London's flood defences, the breach at Dagenham left some 5000 acres flooded leaving, according to Defoe, some land under water for up to 10 years and thus posing a serious threat to the passage of shipping into the heart of London. After 14 years service in Russia under Peter the Great, Perry returned to England in 1712, obtaining the contract to repair the embankment, despite being second choice for the task, in 1715, completing the work in 1720.

An excellent reissue by Nattali, 20 years after the two-volume format, of these splendid landscape views concentrating on the Channel coast. Despite inevitable wear and thus some loss of definition, and allowing for some artistic licence, these scenes still retain their drama. 'So while the scenes are recognisable, they are not geographically correct; cliffs are heightened, the coastline altered, but the essence or sensation of the scene is there. They are above all, picturesque views' (Russell).
